Sperm Concerns

None of you reading this should have any concerns with your sperm production after a vasectomy. The good news is you still produce sperm! So if you believe that sperm production is linked to being a real man then you will be in for a surprise.

Sperm are in no way related to your manhood though some of you reading this may disagree. The fact is your sperm are designed for one purpose only...to hook up with an egg. That's it, fellas.

With a vasectomy, all you are doing is prohibiting your sperm from reaching their destination. They are still produced only now, since their tunnel has been cut, (vas deferens), they have nowhere to go. Thus a massive pile up of millions of sperm occurs and they are simply and harmlessly reabsorbed back into the body.

Sperm are determined microscopic swimmers that number in the hundreds of millions each time you ejaculate. In fact, the average guy has between 180 – 500 million sperm per teaspoon of semen. Try doing the math on this over how many years you have been having sex with a partner or by yourself. Numbers simply don't go that high.

Your sperm want to get laid just as badly as you and the female egg is the only girl in town. Sperm don't care what she looks like either. Millions of them brazenly slam their giant heads against the outside wall of the egg and all it takes is one brave little dude to be selected and to slip in the backdoor and presto! Fertilization and instant baby!

The only surefire guarantee to avoid this happening is a word that most men cannot even speak aloud. Our eyes go wide with fear at the mere mention of it for nature has not wired us to accept this as normal male behavior.....ABSTINENCE.

Aside from the dreaded "A" word....getting SNIPPED is the next best thing to keep your millions of sperm from meeting a sexy female egg.

Make no mistake about it. Sperm are determined and hell-bent on getting inside an egg. On average, they take about 70 days to develop. So that means right now you've got sperm brewing up that won't be ready for another two months. Millions upon millions of them, all getting ready to be shot through the tunnels at warp speed.

Somewhere, in that mass of fat sperm heads and whipping tails, is one dude that will make it in. So, why take that chance?

If you and your wife have decided that you have enough children, are you going to trust condoms, the pill, the pull-out, or other devices from stopping the “Chosen Sperm”?

As effective as the pill is, long term repercussions are still unknown and why should your wife suffer from possible side effects? Hasn't she gone through enough already with the delivery from your children?

As men we cannot fathom the pain a woman goes through during childbirth as a result from one puny miniscule sperm sneaking in an egg's backdoor.

Again, the main purpose of sperm is to fertilize an egg. Unless you are having sex for the sole purpose of trying to get your wife pregnant, then your sperm are pretty much meaningless to you.

If you recall, your goal for getting SNIPPED is to completely avoid getting your wife pregnant and to jump start your sex life. There should be no sperm concerns. They are now your enemy, unless of course you decide on having a vasectomy though, a reversal is not nearly as easy as getting SNIPPED, and you are going to have to open your wallet. Yikes!
